ON CITYSTEP'S
ISLES
YOU WILL FIND
ALL KINDS...

The Schools Program is for fourth and fifth graders who are part of CityStep for their first time.

Sixth graders who continue their involvement in CityStep for a second year are part of the After-Schools Program.

The work of the dancers, teachers, and youth activities coordinators in these programs all comes together with the efforts of the technical producers and musicians in the production you are about to see, The Show.

The Musicians help the show come to life with their original compositions and performances.

Finally, you'll find the producers Behind the Scenes, who organize, publicize, coordinate, and raise money to ensure that every aspect of CityStep runs smoothly.

A Note From the Directors and Producers

Welcome to CityStep's Eleventh Annual Performance, Dancing in the Isles. An organization uniquely combining public service and the performing arts, CityStep brings together over 120 Cambridge Public School children and 175 Harvard-Radcliffe undergraduates. The CityStep philosophy focuses on the importance of self-esteem, dedication, and teamwork. The year-long curriculum stresses each individual's ability to succeed and to achieve his or her goals.

The CityStep show is the result of a collaborative effort of the entire company: the children, production staff, directors, teachers, youth activity coordinators, and composers. Each scene of the show represents elements the kids thought necessary to transform a deserted island into an ideal society. Dancing in the Isles is an originally conceived, produced, choreographed, and composed production.

We would like to thank each one of you for coming to the show and supporting CityStep. Sit back and enjoy the adventures of our island world.

Sincerely,

Alan Askew Maria Kaibel Katherine Locker Jane Sperling Tina Villanueva

THE HISTORY OF CITYSTEP

CityStep began in 1983 when founding director Sabrina Peck led a small group of Harvard students into Cambridge public schools to teach dance-theater. Now CityStep involves over 175 members of the Harvard-Radcliffe community and 120 Cambridge fifth and sixth graders. Such growth is a testament to the success of CityStep's innovative program which combines the spirit of public service with the creativity of the arts.

Throughout the school year, Harvard-Radcliffe undergraduate teaching teams work with Cambridge public school students, helping the kids to express themselves through movement. Undergraduates emphasize the importance of trust, teamwork, and self-confidence in the performing arts. The program culminates in a completely original theater production.

In addition to its regular program, CityStep has given special performances at the Cambridge River Festival, Harvard's 350th Anniversary Celebration, and Jazz Life. For the past nine years, the Mayor of Cambridge has declared a city-wide day to honor CityStep's work. Now, in our eleventh year, we look fondly at this organization's remarkable growth and hope that the spirit of CityStep will live on for years to come.

IN-SCHOOLS DANCE PROGRAM

Two mornings a week, CityStep teams of six or seven Harvard-Radcliffe undergraduates teach “expression through movement” to fourth and fifth grade students in three different Cambridge public schools. This is the first half of CityStep, known as the Schools Program. Undergraduates work with Cambridge public school teachers to integrate the CityStep program into the students’ regular school curriculum.

In the Schools Program, the fourth and fifth grade students and the undergraduates collaborate on exercises and choreography geared toward the development of self-confidence, determination, and teamwork. This is accomplished in the first half of the year through learning the building blocks of dance and theater. They become adept at explaining events, locations, activities, situations, and emotions — without uttering a word. They also become experts at rhythm games, body machines, and creating tableaux by manipulating the basic elements of dance: levels, weight, space and time.

In December, the kids put on a mini-performance for their parents and schoolmates which showcases what they have learned in the first part of the year. In the second half of the year, the newly-learned concepts and techniques are immediately put to use. The creativity and ideas of both the kids and the undergraduates are integrated into the choreography of a specific scene in the final performance in April.

SCHOOLS PROGRAM

IN-SCHOOL YOUTH ACTIVITY COORDINATORS

Youth activity coordinators are an integral part of the CityStep program. Known as YACs, these dedicated undergraduates design art projects for the students. Twice a month the YACs complement the dance curriculum with projects such as silhouette tracing and creative mask making. These activities are tied into the show or other aspects of CityStep. For example, the silhouettes were used as decorations for the CityStep Benefit Ball at Harvard in November and can also be seen on display in the lobby of this auditorium.

In addition to these activities, the YACs are also responsible for planning field trips. The goal of these field trips is to let the students personally experience various types of art and to strengthen the ties between the kids and the undergraduates. This year, the kids were brought to Harvard where they were entertained by one of the University's co-ed a cappella groups, the Veritones.

When not leading activities or taking trips, the YACs play an important role in making the rest of the program run smoothly. During the all-day Saturday and the week of the show, they are responsible for helping to transport the students to and from rehearsals. During the performances, they are responsible for making sure the kids are fully costumed and in their proper places for each scene. Without these unsung heroes who work tirelessly all year, we would not be able to accomplish CityStep's goals.

Alan's Thoughts:

It is a Monday night at Harvard University. My CityStep teachers and I gather for a serious discussion. We are deciding whether the wave kids should be in front or behind the cloud kids in the opening piece. This may not seem like the most important decision facing a college senior. I suppose I would have agreed before directing this program. Now, I labor over such choices. But my attention to detail is not an attempt to preserve my fragile artistic integrity. This is what my kids drive me to do. Because of them, I want to get everything just right, put the wave kids in just the right place. When one kid asks for help with our piece, it fills me with the patience and energy to teach them. They motivate and inspire me because they care about this performance. Cooperating with them to put on this show is one of the most rewarding challenges of my life.

Of course, they do not always understand exactly what I am trying to do and we have tried each other's patience at times. As you will see, however, they pulled together to produce a performance that neither I nor they will ever forget. A quick thank-you to my Youth Activity Coordinators who were a reservoir of energy and aid throughout the year and to my composer for his talent and patience. A special thanks goes to my teachers, each one of whom could always broaden my smile or ease my frown. And of course, thanks to the CitySteppers from Fletcher for proving to everyone what they are capable of and letting me be a part of it.

Jane's Thoughts:

While I have always enjoyed dancing, CityStep has given me the context necessary to see that dance has the potential to build communities, make connections, and cross language barriers. Encouraging children to unleash all the creative energy that is bubbling up and waiting to explode out of them has made for some of the most meaningful experiences of my life. Because so much of dance involves letting the inside show through on the outside, each step requires taking personal risks. As the kids experiment with this new mode of expression, they learn to challenge themselves by having their bodies and minds connect in ways they never thought possible. The result of all this jumping, turning, and leaping is a tremendous sense of accomplishment and pride in oneself. I am proud of my Longfellow students as well as everyone up on stage tonight because I have watched them tackle a lot of difficult things, and in the process they have taught me so much.

What makes CityStep additionally special for me is that the communities which are formed in the CityStep classes are replicated at the level of the entire organization. Each member plays an invaluable role in the success of this program, and without the collaborative efforts of everyone involved, CityStep would not be what it is today. For the past four years, I've been so lucky to have worked with such amazingly dedicated and talented people, all of whom have contributed to making the CityStep bond very unique and incredibly strong. I would especially like to thank my Co-Directors for their tremendous support and encouragement this year. And as a final note to my CityStep students (past and present), thank-you for providing me with memories that I will hold on to forever.

AFTER-SCHOOLS PROGRAM

The fifth graders who participate in CityStep are all invited back for a more advanced program the following year. This year there were enough kids to have two After-Schools classes, one on Mondays and Wednesdays and the other on Wednesdays and Fridays. The classes are made up of students from Graham and Parks, Longfellow, Peabody, Tobin, and Kennedy elementary schools.

Our main goal in the After-Schools Program is to increase the self-esteem of each individual. This is accomplished through dance as well as other activities. Each class begins with a circle in which we talk about the plans for that day of CityStep. At the end of circle we often have games and warm-up to get everyone excited for what we are going to learn that day.

The Teachers then begin to explain the steps and eight-counts for that day. Each class is given a theme for their dance, and by the end of the year the different steps combine to make up one of the final dances in the show. The After-Schools this year each have two dances in the show, as well as the opening and the finale. The Teachers and kids choreograph the dances together, often using moves which the kids have made up themselves.

Because this is their second year, more is expected of the students. They have more complicated dances, which are built upon the techniques they developed the year before. They also learn cooperation skills, since in this program there are kids from different Cambridge schools. The kids learn that even though they are not together in school, in CityStep we are all one class working together to put on the best show possible.

The Youth Activity Coordinators, playfully called the YACs, are an integral part of the CityStep program. While they are in charge of providing transportation as well as snacks for the kids, their most important role is in developing Activities which allow the kids to take pride in and express themselves. These projects range from arts and crafts, such as making calendars and necklaces, to theater games in which the kids take on different roles.

Another aspect of being a YAC is seen as the show approaches. Each of the Coordinators, working along with the various producers, works backstage to ensure that all runs smoothly throughout the show. They are in charge of everything from helping the kids change costumes to making sure they get to the stage on time. A good deal of this time is also spent calming the nerves of all the dancers, assuring them that the year of hard work will definitely pay off.

As you can see, besides their role as Activity Coordinators, YACs also fill a lot of the gaps that arise in CityStep. Their Activities add another artistic aspect to the classes, while fulfilling the same goals as the dancing. The YACs and Teachers work together to make the kids realize how special they are and how much they can accomplish with a bit of work.

Tina's Thoughts:

When people ask me what I have concentrated in during my four years at Harvard, I'm often tempted to reply, "CityStep." It certainly wouldn't be an exaggeration. During the four years that I have been involved in CityStep, I have often spent as much time, energy and thought as has been required for any one of my classes. The difference is that CityStep has allowed me to explore diverse skills such as choreography, teaching, administration and negotiation all at once. With CityStep, I have had to put my thoughts and ideas into action knowing that they will ultimately affect important people around me, namely the kids involved in CityStep. The responsibility of having to account for more than myself when making decisions has taught me more than any textbook ever could have.

With this in mind, I am eternally grateful for the opportunity to work with people who have whole-heartedly dedicated their time to making CityStep a success. My fellow directors, producers, teachers and composers have all worked collectively towards one goal—allowing the children to express themselves and to feel confident in their abilities as individuals. I will never forget the invaluable lessons the kids have taught me and the strength they have given me to persist even when I feel a task to be impossible. As a graduating senior, I know I will have to draw on that strength often! I will forever cherish the experiences that I have had through this wonderful organization.

Kath and Jane, thank you for sharing these times with me and supporting me through it all. I couldn't have done it without you!

Kath's Thoughts:

As I began my second year directing the After-Schools program, I was extremely anxious. How would this year compare to last year? Would my kids, coming from last year's Peabody and Tobin fifth grade classes, be able to function as a unit? The Monday-Wednesday After-Schools class made my worries disappear. The energy and unique personality of each of the children and their ability to work as one class made my final year in CityStep one of the most exciting and rewarding experiences of my entire Harvard career.

The CitySteppers I worked with this year made me proud to be their director. Each of them grew as individuals and as members of the class. I was always amazed at their determination to learn even the most challenging steps and at their willingness to help each other. In addition to mastering what we presented, the kids all contributed to the dances. At the end of one class, the teachers and I sat around listening to the last eight counts of the fire piece. We couldn't decide how to make a final pose match the music. One of the kids who was waiting to go home exclaimed, "Why don't you just do this," and showed us a perfect ending! This enthusiasm and creativity have been the essence of my CityStep experience with the Monday-Wednesday After-Schoolers. I couldn't have asked for a better class with whom to spend my final year.

The experience could not have been so special without my teaching team. Of all my years in CityStep, I have never seen a team with such unity and appreciation for each other. Thank you for reminding me what teamwork truly means. Your hard work, dedication, invaluable support, and skillful teaching have been central to bringing out the confidence and pride in all of the kids. I also want to give a special thanks to Kanna and the youth activity coordinators. Without you, this year could never have been possible.

As a final note to my kids, I hope that this year you have come to realize that with hard work you can accomplish anything. Always remember, no matter how challenging something may appear, you all have the potential to accomplish your goals. After-Schoolers, teachers, youth activity coordinators, and CityStep company, thank you for making my final year of CityStep the best that it could be!

THE SHOW

During the veritable chaos that accompanies the production of the CityStep Show, one can be tempted to forget the purpose of the performance. But it's very simple. The CityStep kids are not only the reason for the show but also the major creative talent behind it. One example of their originality is their contribution to the choreography of many of the pieces that you will see performed tonight. The kids have learned more than just choreography, however. They have learned responsibility, teamwork, and a unique way of relating to both their classmates and the undergraduates. CityStep provides an environment of trust and cooperation that leads to a totally different type of learning.

provides an environment of trust and cooperation that leads to a totally different type of

The Show is also a place for other people to learn—namely, the production staff. You may never see them on the stage, but these talented undergraduates have been working on this event since September. Every aspect of the show, from costumes to sound design to set, lights, and props is handled by undergraduates. The old cliché that “it is harder than it looks” definitely holds true for the behind-the-scenes aspect of CityStep. Remember—when you applaud for the tremendous efforts of those you see onstage, there are countless others who deserve your recognition. CityStep is a collaborative effort for all involved and we hope that every aspect of the show will have you “Dancing in the Isles!”

Maria's Thoughts:

At the beginning of the year I spent hours planning out my curriculum ideas. I carefully constructed activities to try and achieve CityStep's mission of self-expression and self-confidence building. Armed with these "masterpieces," I entered the classroom. Here, despite my experience and my planning, my activities failed. Nothing seemed to go the way I had wanted it to; some days I walked away feeling as if I had accomplished nothing, only giving the kids a diversion from their school work. But as the year progressed, I slowly came to realize that the failure of my intricate ideas was what CityStep was really about. CityStep is not carefully orchestrated games or dance moves, but a process. Real self-expression and self-confidence came not with specific activities but with the entire experience. What made CityStep a learning experience for the kids, for the teachers and for me, were the failures and successes we went through together. Unfortunately, this performance can only give a glance at the risks, frustrations and achievements of our class.

I want to thank my team and my class for their constant dedication and support. The goals and standards that I set for you and that you set for yourselves have been surpassed. I have learned so much from each of you. I would also like to thank the whole company for making CityStep such a warm and giving community.

MUSICIANS

How do you write music that is "green," "fuzzy," and "hungry?" Those were some of the demands placed upon our composers, and they answered with style.

Through intense collaboration with a choreographer, a composer slowly chisels a concept into musical form. A piece must convey both the on-stage action and the overall plot while simultaneously highlighting particular moves and emotions.

Most importantly, though, the music must sound "CityStep-y" which is a certain je ne sais quoi that is only accomplished through many long nights of soul-searching artistic angst.

Our corps of musicians come with abundant experience from diverse backgrounds, to say the least, but CityStep is a completely new genre and a unique challenge. The fact that their signatures are well evident in the music should be testimony to their artistic integrity and self-expression. We hope you'll agree.

How do you write music that is "green," "fuzzy," and "hungry"?

Russ's Thoughts:

It would be easy to list the tasks and quests which Shiuan and I have had to fulfill as Musical Directors for CityStep: the under-the-gun composition, the consultation with other composers and choreographers, the immediate revisions and sometimes rewriting of pieces, the recording engineering when engineers were not available, and the stage and sound management at the Cabaret and rehearsals. What is not so easy to sum up in words is the sense of pride, accomplishment, and completion that comes from the successful execution of these tasks. Over the past few months, we have seen working relationships come together between our composers and their choreographers. We have seen artistic relationships grow between our own music and the choreographers' movement. But perhaps most importantly, we have seen the happiness and the sense of wonder that all of this brings to the children involved with CityStep. It would be a deception to say that we have had an easy time of it, but it would be a denial to say that we haven't enjoyed it. The true worth of CityStep always makes itself evident in the end.

Shiuan's Thoughts:

Call it "trial and tribulation" if you wish. To me, this past half-year has been a blur of odds and ends. It's been about deejays and speaker rentals, about cassette duplication and digital mastering. It's been about missing tapes and broken equipment, deadlines and budgets, and worrying about which side to take when a composer balks at the choreographer's plea for "just one more cute sound."

It's easy to get lost in the middle of all this, especially at 5 o'clock in the morning doing a mixdown. For all those times, I'd like to thank Russ, my co-director, for entertaining me with his Billy Joel renditions and for being the most effective composer I've ever worked with. I'd like to thank those in the CityStep company who have helped make my life easier, and that's almost everybody.

I'd also like to thank the teachers who, by being so impossibly giddy, constantly reminded me of the excitement and reason why I got involved in CityStep in the first place. "It's for the kids!" they cheer. Well, then, I'd like to thank the kids most of all, because I expect that when the curtains go up and they start dancing to the music, everything will fall into place for me. When that happens, God bless my stone-cold heart if I don't shed tears of happiness.

BEHIND THE SCENES

After the show is over and before students disperse for the summer, a production staff of undergraduates begins tending to the logistics which will make the next year's program and show as successful as those of the past. The production board is comprised of a group of seventeen tireless individuals whose energy and enthusiasm keeps CityStep dancing. Their tasks vary, but each producer plays a vital role in the overall success of the program.

The producers of the schools and afterschools programs oversee the countless administrative details of all the children's CityStep classes. They keep the parents and school teachers up to date about rehearsals, performances, and the students' progress throughout the year. The publicity and graphics producers are responsible for informing the Harvard and Cambridge communities about current CityStep developments; they maintain the crucial communication link between the undergraduates and the city of Cambridge. Of course, CityStep would not be possible without funding from a variety of sources. The producers of finance, special events, grants, sales, and private donations all develop fundraisers to provide the students and undergraduates with the resources to create a successful program. Finally, the performance producers are responsible for the technical aspects of tonight's show. Without them, no light would be lit, no set would be built, and no curtain would be raised.

In addition to producers, there are countless individuals serving on production committees who contribute their energies and talents to specific projects throughout the year. Their assistance to the producers is immeasurable. All of these undergraduates are an important part of the CityStep machine. Without them, much of the CityStep program would not be possible.

Courtney's Thoughts:

When I was a senior in high school flipping through mountains of college catalogs, a picture in the glossy Harvard booklet of some jumping kids frozen in mid-air with huge grins on their faces caught my eye. With CityStep's logo emblazoned across their chests, the kids and undergraduates in that photograph became a significant part of my mental image of Harvard long before I knew anything about this fabulous organization. So when I saw posters advertising organizational meetings for CityStep plastered all over campus in the fall of my freshman year, I felt instinctively drawn toward this program.

Three years and dozens of meetings after that initial orientation session, I have watched hundred of dancers like those whose images were frozen in the catalog photograph come to life. This tireless organization is a union of individuals who prize movement and growth. I have seen countless ideas and dreams put into action by CityStep's hands; this program is fueled by its common belief in the kids it serves, and that belief sustains and rewards all the undergraduates who work throughout the year to make this performance and the day-to-day logistics of CityStep a success.

impression of Harvard because now that I have had the pleasure of working with this amazing program, CityStep will always be a defining element of my undergraduate years. As a "Behind the Scenes" participant in this organization I have been given an extraordinary opportunity to contribute to a program whose ideals and accomplishments I will always admire. Thank you, CityStep, for giving so much of yourself to me.

Allison's Thoughts:

Working behind the scenes, producers can only hope that the job they're doing is making a difference. Unable to cross my fingers and wait patiently, I had to see for myself. Tina's afterschool class has been, for me, an energetic barometer of CityStep's progress throughout the year. As an afterschool YAC, I have been given a unique perspective on how the administrative decisions made in Monday night production meetings translate into the high-excitement, unpredictable world of the dance studio on Wednesday and Friday afternoons.

As a YAC, I've been given the chance to answer, first-hand, the questions we undergraduates can only guess at; questions like "Just how many kids will fit on a Harvard Shuttle Bus?" and "Are juice boxes still cool in sixth grade?" Throughout the year, in the classroom, I have seen the results of the effort put forth by our phenomenal production board, and I would like to thank them for it. As Executive Producer, I have a magnificent bird's-eye view of the CityStep organization, but I must admit that the most valuable CityStep lessons I've learned have been taught up-close by an incredible crew of 10 to 12 year olds.

As a freshman, CityStep offered me a stress-free, highly enjoyable experience for a few hours each week as a Youth Supervisor. In this, my senior year, CityStep probably represents the most high-stress, time-consuming element of my Harvard existence, but nevertheless, it remains the most enjoyable, and I cannot repay it for the value it has added to each of my four years at Harvard-Radcliffe.

CityStep would particularly like to thank Dean Archie C. Epps III for his support, advice, and guidance since 1983.
